THE HARD WAY

Orval Owl was known far and wide throughout the forest for his wisdom. All the little animals and birds always came to him whenever they had a problem, and Orval, using his sound and wise judgement, was usually able to help them out.

When Soapy and Suzy Squirrel were first married, they had gone to Orval to see what advice he had to offer them. Orval thought carefully before giving them an answer, then said: "All I can advise you two is to plan things well and think of the future at all times. When the trees are in bloom and nuts are plentiful, always remember to put some away for the winter." The two young squirrels listened to the wise old owl — and they were glad. For that winter was an unusually cold one, but with the food supply they had saved up they had no worries.

Richie Raccoon was another of the woodland folk who was glad he had gone to Orval Owl for advice. It seemed that Richie had a great deal of trouble catching fish — and this was particularly embarrassing to him, since all raccoons were supposed to be good fishermen. Orval Owl studied Richie carefully, then came up with this solution: "Richie, if you will remember to take off that black mask you always wear, I do believe you'll be able to see the fish better." And, sure enough, when Richie fished without his black mask, he had no trouble catching as many fish as he wanted.

Manny Mouse's problem was easily solved by Orval. Manny had long been tormented by Chester Cat, who would always sneak up on him and try to catch him. He simply gave Manny a little bell which the mouse tied around Chester's neck as the cat lay sleeping one day. From then on, Manny was able to hear Chester whenever he came close enough to pounce on him and he didn't have to be afraid anymore.

Yes, there was no doubt about Orval Owl's wisdom — he was a wonderful and helpful member of the animal community. But Orval, who helped so many of his friends, had a problem of his own that he was unable to solve. It seemed that his son Ozzie was somewhat of a problem child. Not that Ozzie was destructive or mean; it was just that he had a mind of his own and would never listen to his father's advice. Ozzie's grades in the Woodville school weren't exceptionally good, but that was his own fault; he just wouldn't study. Imagine! This young owl had the smartest father in all the woods to help him with his home work, but he never accepted his help. In fact, it was rare indeed for Ozzie to even do his home work.

Not eating his cereal in the morning was another of Ozzie's bad habits — but the thing that worried Orval Owl and his wife Olivia Owl was the way Ozzie ignored their warnings to be careful of Horace Hawk. All the little animals and birds feared the big, dangerous hawk who came swooping down from the sky to snatch up anyone who wasn't careful enough to escape his clutches. They feared for their very lives whenever that dark shadow appeared; for it was said that Horace liked nothing better for a snack than a squirrel, a chicken — or an owl!

But Ozzie had just laughed whenever the Name of Horace Hawk was mentioned. "Who's afraid of that overgrown pigeon!" he would scoff. "He can't scare me."

"I'm afraid, my dear," said Orval to his wife Olivia, "that Ozzie will have to learn about the ways of Horace Hawk the hard way. I only hope and pray that the lesson will not be too severe."

One fine day, Ozzie Owl was walking home from school with his two best pals, Ray Rabbit and Snuffy Squirrel. The three youngsters were chattering happily as they went their merry way — never once noticing the small black object circling high above them. All at once Snuffy Squirrel stopped walking and looked up — just in time to see Horace Hawk swooping downward toward them.

"Run for your lives, fellas," shouted Snuffy, as the black shadow came even closer. "That's Horace Hawk and he looks mighty hungry."

Ray Rabbit needed no further warning. In three seconds he had scampered into a nook between two rocks and was safe from harm. Snuffy raced for a hollow tree trunk, and he, too, was out of danger.

As Ray and Snuffy peeked cautiously from their hiding places, they were shocked to see Ozzie still standing out in the open. And, to make matters worse, the foolish little owl was actually teasing the big, bad hawk. Ozzie looked straight up into the sky at Horace and puffed out his cheeks. Then he stuck out his tongue and popped his large eyes.

"I'm not afraid of you, you bully," Ozzie yelled up at the diving Horace Hawk. "You can't scare me ..."

And before Ozzie had finished insulting Horace, the huge hawk had the squirming owl in his grasp and was winging off toward the high cliff where he had his nest.

Ray and Snuffy had seen the whole thing, and as soon as they felt it was safe they dashed helter skelter to the home of Orval Owl. Snuffy breathlessly told Orval what had happened to Ozzie, and the wise owl immediately began to put his brain to work. He had to come up with a plan to save Ozzie before it was too late.

Meanwhile, Horace Hawk and the trembling Ozzie had arrived at Horace's nest. Ozzie, realizing he was in great danger, trembled with fear in a corner of the nest, trying to avoid Horace Hawk's piercing gaze.

"Now you stay right there, you plump little owl," leered Horace (as if poor Ozzie could have gone anywhere). "I'm going out for a while, but I'll be back in time for supper."

"What are you going to have for supper?"

asked Ozzie a bit fearfully.

"You!" shouted Horace Hawk, and he took off from the nest and soared away.

By this time Orval Owl had had time to think things over and was all ready with a plan to try and save Ozzie from the clutches of Horace Hawk. He told Ray Rabbit and Snuffy Squirrel to go home and not to worry about Ozzie. Then he gathered a large bag of food — nuts, fruit, sandwiches, candy, pickles — and dashed out of the house.

Orval soon arrived at the spot where Horace had snatched Ozzie away. He put down the bag of food and stretched out on the grass, waiting for Horace Hawk to show up. And Orval didn't have to wait long; for, almost as soon as the wise old owl made himself comfortable, the sharp eyes of Horace Hawk picked him out. Horace dived downward, but Orval leaped out of his path and into the safety of a hollow log — purposely leaving the bag of food behind. When the greedy hawk spied the huge bag of goodies, he forgot all about Orval and pounced on the food. Losing no time, Horace quickly gobbled up the entire contents of the bag, then plopped down, stuffed, on the grass.

Orval Owl then walked boldly up to Horace, and the hawk tried to grab him — but he had eaten so much that he couldn't move.

"Hmm," observed Orval Owl, "I don't think you'll be doing any flying for a while, my fine feathered friend. I believe I'll get my son now and bring him home."

"Grumph, mmf, fnnf," was all Horace said in reply. For he was so stuffed he couldn't even talk, much less fly.

Orval Owl promptly flew to the nest of Horace Hawk and, without saying a word, put Ozzie on his back and flew home. (Ozzie had not yet learned how to fly.)

As they entered the front door of the house into the waiting arms of Olivia Owl, Ozzie finally broke the silence.

"Pop," said Ozzie, "from now on I'll always mind every word you say. I don't know how you ever kept that terrible Horace Hawk away long enough to save me; I'm just thankful that you did."

"Well, son," replied Orval Owl, "let's say that friend Horace has been temporarily grounded. The important thing is that you've finally come to your senses."

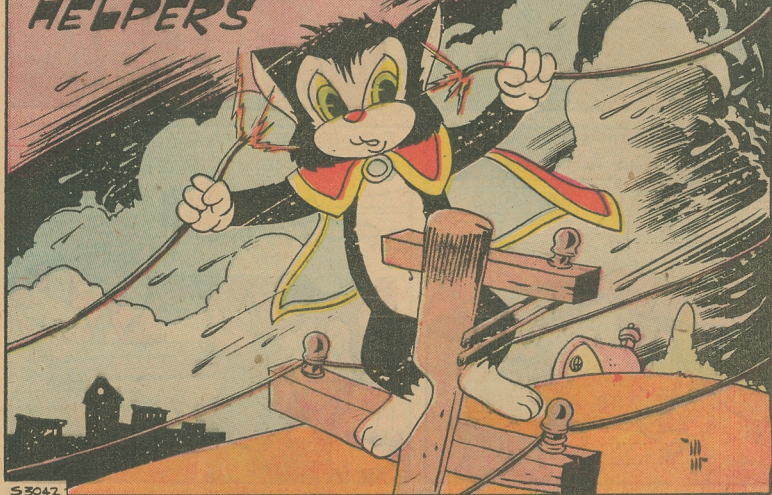

"That's right, Pop," said Ozzie Owl, "but I sure had to learn the hard way."
